Self-Reflection For Leadership Presentation

I had created a presentation on the book “The Obligation to Endure” by Rachel Carson. After reviewing my work I noticed the mistakes I had made in my presentation. I had a lack of information pertaining to the writing strategies and formatting of the book. I was confused in what her writing style was and I hadn't fully understood her method in formatting. I should have researched more into her writing style through reviews of her book. I had struggled in formatting my presentation on several slides. On the fourth slide I centered my text which resulted in it being difficult to read. My intentions This choice was inconsistent with my overall organization. In my upcoming presentation I will need to stick to a format by creating drafts of my work. Another issue I had was my word choice which could have led to confusion. In terms of words I used in my presentation, “competition” was used to describe the interaction between man and insects. This had confused my audience and led them to not understand what I had tried conveying. I should have used a word like fight to illustrate the battle humans and insects are having for food. When we go to my solution page I had not indicated where I had gotten these ideas to combat insects impacting crops without hurting the environment. I had posted a link to indicate where I had gotten a solution from but it was confusing as it didn't belong there. Instead I should have placed the link on my citation page but I had forgotten to source my information and create this page. In my next presentation my main goal is to present my information in a consistent format and be able to make my information understandable to my audience.
